NATIONALISATION URGED.

London, February 24. In the House of Commons, Mr. Adamson expressed the opinion that the spirit animating both the Premier and the President of the Miners' Federation gave every promise of finding a 'solution of the dispute. He urged the Government to deal with the questions of wages and hours before the 26th inst. and also asked the Premier | this afternoon at 4 o'clock. to agree to the principle of nationalisation and leave it to the proposed Commission to make the enquiries necessary before the Government could make such a big deal.

ENGLISH EDUCATION BILL.

WHAT IT AIMS AT.

In her recently published reminiscences, Mrs. Humphry Ward remarks that the measures of educational reconstruction, chief among them the Fisher Education Act of August, are largely embodiments of the ideas of Matthew Arnold (says the New York Evening Post.) Neither family pride nor the tendency to magnify the influence of great figures detracts very much from this statement. Matthew Arnold was from 1851 to 1886, or to within two years of his death, inspector of schools. He made inquiries for successive educational commission; his writings on education extend through his ocsays and criticisms; he had a share in the Education Acts of 1870, and 1876, which established England's system of board schools and compulsory educătion; and in educational controversies within and without Parliament since he had been much quoted. The Royal mission's report on secondary education in 1895, as his friend and fellow-educator Sir · Joshua Fitch said, "proceeds to a large extent on lines which he was the first to trace, and recommends a policy which would have gone far to realise his hopes." Few Englishmen did more to call attention to the crying faults of "our wretched middle-class education," as he called it. But Arnold's criticism was constructive as well as destructive, and dealt with hard realities as well as with abstract principle.

The new Education Bill carries onward an idea which Arnold consistently emphasized—the idea that Britian, which had always shown an insular dread of state organisation, must have recourse to it. In the report he was asked to make upon French and German education. Arnold was able to argue powerfuly for state interference. We gladly recall that he turned rather to France than Germany. "The power of France in Europe," he wrote, "is at this day mainly owing to the completeness with which she has organised democratic institution." Of the usualprivate school he was contemptuous: have this year [1880] been reading 'David Copperfield' for the first time; Mr. Creakle's school at . Blackheath is the type of our middle-class schools, and our middle class is satisfied that it should be for endowed schools which herded into one enclosure children of a single sort-schools for clergy orphans, for children of army officers, or for small denominations. In "Culture and Anarchy" are found his scathing words upon schools founded by grocers or commercial travellers as likely to bring up children "not only at home, but at school too, in a kind of odor of licensed victualism or bagmanism." The same book contains his applause of the Continental idea "that it is the business of the heads and representatives of a nation by virtue of their superior means, power, cational policies. The new bill carries comprehensive State action to an extreme quite bold enough to suit Arnold. In writing on education above the elementary years, Arnold laid great emphasis on the need for "good secondary schools, and for a broader national equipment of of your antiquated rubbish—all one of the Italian naval ports. universities. He hoped for a dozen good provincial universities universities in the Continental sense, democratic and encouraging research; these have come in the last two decades. His essay on "A French Eton" described two French secondary institutions which he believed hold many lessons for England: the lycee at Toulouse, and a private school at Soreze. Of what secondary schools England had fifty years ago he had no high opinion. The sixth and seventh parts Friendship's Garland" bitingly satirical. Did Blank and Dash learn much at Eton and the Charterhouse? Well, Arnold replies, it is hard to judge, for when he knew them at Oxford they were

THE RACES.

SUMMARY OF THE RESULTS.

Yesterday concluded the Hongkong Jookey Club Race Meeting for 1919 and it is fitting that it should be possible to describe the function as one of the most successful Meetings ever held in the Colony in view of the fact that it is the first since the declaration of the Armistice. Everything went without a hitch; there were no accidents to riders and no untoward occurrences to mar the proceedings. The highest praise is due to the Stewards and their assistants and also to G.S.M. Hurle, and the soldiers under him, for the adequate manner in which the various' tasks were arried out. Also the Pand of the 18th Infantry must not be forgotten, the members of which, under the baton of Bandmaster Vassallo, helped considerably towards the success of the Meeting. The police, under Chief Inspector Kerr, carried out their part (a Those who intend going to the very onerous and uninteresting Racecourse on Saturday had part) in a manner beyon better keep a tight hold on their reproved, and the Meeting closes pockets, for Malini, the magician, leaving a feeling of great satisis once again in Hongkong after faction on the part of all con-

CUNARD AT ANTWERP.

The Cunard Line is reported to be contemplating the installation at Antwerp of a new Transatlantic service. It is suggested that the Cunard Line should be offered the reversion of the North-German Lloyd's pre-war quays. The report is hailed with enthusiasm in Belgian commercial circles, which are most anxious to secure the earliest revision of Scheldt regime and restoration of Antwerp to its old position among the world's ports. A step in this direction is the Belgian Relief Commission's decision to make Antwerp, in stead of Rotterdam, its port o discharge and supply. During the week arrivals at Antwerp included several British steamers. among which was the Marylebone, conveying the British Con-General. Sir Hertslet, and several represenof British shipping interests. While Belgium at present reserves to herself a free hand in regard to her commercial policy, she desires the unrestricted enlargement of economic relations with Great Britain, the reopening of communications with which is eagerly awaited. The stabilisation of Belgian exchange on London is welcomed as an indication of British sympathies, and a generous estimate of future prospects. There is reason to believe that the British authorities propose enlarging the scope of our commercial representation in Belgium.

> "BOLSHEVIK." A correspondent in the Times recently explained how the words "Bolshevik" and Menshevik" arose. It appears that in 1903, at the second conference of the Russian Social-Democratic Party, when the methods to be adopted in regard to revolutionary activity were under discussion, a sharp line of cleavage made itself evident. When voting took place there was naturally a majority Bolshinstvo) and a minority Menshinstvo). From that moment the groups were called "Bolsheviks" and Mensheviks." The choice of these words had nothing to do with their policies, nor are the terms, as many suppose, of German origin. The authority for the explanation is a pamphlet by Dr. Charushin, published in Moscow in 1917
